In terms of college football, the second Saturday in October is synonymous with one thing; the Red River rivalry battle between the Texas Longhorns and Oklahoma Sooners. This huge game is the earliest of the big rivalry games between powerhouses from the same conferences usually reserved for the seasons end. Oddsmakers at online sports wagering leader Sportsbook.com list the Sooners as 6 1/2 &ndash;chalk favorites over the Horns with a 56 ½ total. Money Line prices have the Sooners favored at -240 while the Longhorns are getting +200. This game is significant because the winner usually goes on to win the BIG 12 South Division and represent in the conference's championship game in December. So who will win? All the experts seem to be pointing to Oklahoma. While both teams have great offenses and Heisman Trophy caliber quarterbacks, the Sooners are considered the best team overall.

Both teams's stats after five games are eerily similar. Almost mirror image for sure. Oklahoma has scored 12 more points than Texas but the Longhorns have allowed 12 fewer points by the opposition than Oklahoma. The difference will probably come down to the quarterbacks, Colt McCoy of Texas and Sam Bradford of Oklahoma. Both Bradford and McCoy are 70% passers who put tremendous pressure on opponent's defenses. If either team could find a solid running game, it would also be a huge advantage in the game.
